I might have mentioned last time we were talking about swinging that the first step is to talk openly and honestly with your partners about what they're comfortable with. Kids are the same way, of course — I knew my son would one day find out I liked to swing, but I didn't want him to become curious about something he wasn't ready to know about. But he was curious. He also wanted to try it out. So he asked. We had a discussion. I wasn't flapping my gums about my swinging years (no pun intended), just asking him some questions about how he felt. I don't remember the exact details of the conversation, but I do remember I told him that people feel (feel) a lot of different things when they first try it out. I told him that some people feel the same as I do. Others feel different. We also talked about how my desire to swing is different from the typical porn-based sex fantasy. What most people generally want is a quick and dirty blowjob. They want a male to mount them from behind, stroke and thrust into them, and then move on. This isn't what I want. To me, it's like having a long steak dinner and then slicing it up into little pieces — I want to take my time and enjoy the meat. We talked about how guys have been trying to convince guys how hard it is to screw a woman as a way of deflecting their own sexual urges. I told him that was a lot of hooley, that a woman can tell, once a man has experience, what he wants. I believe this because I understand the dynamics of what women want, so I could identify what I wanted from a partner. He understood what I was getting at and we talked some more about what he wanted. I told him that what we had talked about was true, and I thought it was important. I told him it's very important to let him know what I want, even if I don't f678ea9f9e
